

Source Localization Using Vector Sensors and Microphones

Finding the location of a source emitting signals is of high importance in a variety of applications. Examples include camera pointing systems for video conferencing, speech recognition systems, surveillance, gun shot localization, etc. This research of the aCASP Lab is focused on developing and implementing advanced localization methods using vector sensors and microphones.